

Can the town staff answer the following questions for Carrboro citizens:

1) How does a citizen check to see if there are any livestock raising restrictions or any livestock slaughtering restrictions controlling their property?

2) How does a citizen check to see if there are any livestock raising restrictions or any livestock slaughtering restrictions controlling a neighbor's property?

3) Is there a public database or a town map which shows citizens where these restrictions are present? If not, then why not?

4) Is there any model deed restriction language that the town can provide to those of its citizens who wish to eliminating livestock raising or livestock slaughtering on their specific property or on any property within their homeowners' association control, should they have one? If not, then why not?

5) If livestock raising or livestock slaughtering restrictive language applies to a property on which these activities are occurring, how does a citizen enforce them? Do they have to sue their neighbor in court? Will town of Carrboro animal control officers enforce the provisions? If not, then why not?

6) If a neighbor is slaughtering animals on their property but refuses to follow these state guidelines, do you have to sue your neighbor to get compliance? Or do you have to go to the state Ag Department to get compliance?

7) Will the town of Carrboro do anything to help you if your neighbor is engaging in animal slaughtering mindless of public health?
